THE GREAT MISTAKE.

Commercial Gazette.-The country obviously made a mistake in trusting the Democratic party with power which that party does not know how to use. There has been a calamitous change. The President happens to be sound on one point, and fortunately he puts that to the front. His specialty is to stop the sale of silver, and with Republican help he will carry it against the majority of his own party. There is no guessing, however, what is beyond that, and the people ought to know. They should inadjourns.

While sawing staves a piece of timber fell in front of the saw and was burled with terrific force, striking Mr. Lewis in the musel of the left arm, tearing an usity gash. Mr. Hilan was struck behind the left car by the same piece, tearing that member from its socket. Nine stitches were necessary to close the wound. Had either been struck in the head at no distant time the place will be enjoying a great deal of business. D. A. Cornett now has in course of erection a fine hotel, E. P. Reynolds has just completed a fine residence and twelve other dwelling-chouses are being erected. A company has been organized which has purchased seven acres of land and will at once start an immense stave rateory. With plenty of timber convenient and good shipping facilities there is no reason why it should not be a success in every particular. The little town has a bright future before it.

who ever lived who was less dependent upon the glory and achievements of his progenitors for his own position and success than our candidate, yet when we see the extraordinary and stirring spectacle of an unbroken succes-sion of the most brilliant qualities of mind and heart transmitted from father to son and from generation to generation without any break or intermission in the blaze of glory which flashes along the whole line; and when this line has been distinguished through all changes and vicissitudes of fortunes and changes and vicissitudes of fortunes and times for its unswerving devotion to the same cause and principles which we are endeavoring to uphold and sustain—then ancestral glory and greatness become something more than a vain boast to "pamper empty pride" and self consequence—then the giorious record of the dead becomes a piecge for the living and affords us the best assurance that our confidence is not hastily and improvidently given. I have also made this reterence to the past public records of our country for another purpose—I have done it to show John C. Breckinridge, apart from his own distinguished services, has claims upon the country and upon the party,—claims founded in the holiest and most affecting considerations which can influence the mind or beart—claims founded upon a long succession of the most A BASTARDY case in the County Court which can influence the mind of heart—claims founded upon a long succession of the most brilliant and invaluable public services rer-dered by his life in bygone years, and but im-perfectly requitted by his country. brilliant and invaluable public services rendered by his life in bygone years, and but imperfectly requited by his country. I have done it too to show that John C. Breckinridge is a patriot by birth, by hereditary and family recollections and associations and by all those moral influences apart from the convictions of reason or the promptings of expediency, which enter most nearly and powerfully into the formation of the character and the principles of every man. He must be treacherous to all the blood in his veins, forget all the traditions of his family, unlearn all that he was taught in infancy by the tender lips of his mother and all the precepts impressed in later years by the authority of his illustrious father; he must lose the memory of all that he has ever learned, and separate himself from all that is most glorious and elevating in the past history of himself and family, before he can ever prove untrue to the country which delighted to honor his ancestors and which it was their greatest pleasure to serve and promote. I have made these references to the family history of John C. Breckinridge as the most perfect refutation which can be given to the absurd charge which constitutes the sole weapon of offense in the hands of our adversaries, that our candidate is the leader, the life and animating spirit of a party which is treacherous to the country and aims at the dissolution of the Union. What! John C. Breckinridge a traitor to his country and an enemy to the Union of the states! "Publish it not in Gath. Tell it not in the streets of Askelon!" Where is the man so blinded by party zeal, and so carried away by political intemperance as to lend a willing car to a charge so preposterous and absurd? Who is John C. Breckinridge? In what school did he learn his political principles? Whose hands and mind and heart shaped and formed his character at that tender and impressible age, when mind and heart shaped and formed his character at that tender and impressible agrandaughter of that venerable patriot I have be
